

You can often order flowers online without creating an account if the checkout offers a guest option. An account may be more convenient for repeat orders, but it is not always necessary.

Reasons to open an account

If you plan to send flowers again, an account may save time. A site might keep your contact information and delivery addresses, which means you may not need to enter them again for your next order. Some sites also provide a list of earlier purchases.

Past orders can help you find an address you used before or recall which flowers you sent. The available features differ from one site to another, so check what an account includes before signing up.

An account may also give you a place to check the progress of an order. Still, keep the confirmation email until delivery is complete. It can include your order number and details on how to contact the seller if you need help.

Reasons to order as a guest

For a one-time purchase, guest checkout can be the simpler route. It lets you provide the delivery information without choosing a password or adding another account to manage.

You will generally still have to enter the details needed to process the purchase and deliver the flowers. These may include your name, email address, payment information and the recipient's address. Choosing guest checkout does not remove the need to give the seller those details.

After ordering, look for the confirmation in your email and save it. Keep the order number as well. If you later need to ask about the purchase, the confirmation can help identify it.

Review checkout and site policies

Before picking an account or guest option, read the checkout page and the site's policies. Check these points:

- Whether guest checkout is offered for the order you are placing.
- Which details the site requires to take payment and arrange delivery.
- How to follow the order or get in touch with the seller.
- If you are signing up for promotional emails.
- What the site says about using and storing your information.

If the site requires an account, review the sign-up information before you go further. Decide if you are comfortable setting one up. If not, you can choose to place the order somewhere else.

Protect your account and check the order

If you decide to register, use a strong password that you have not used on another site. A password manager can create a password and store it for you. You can also avoid saving payment information if you do not want it kept for future purchases.

Before submitting the order, carefully review the recipient's address, requested delivery date and card message. These details are important regardless of how you check out. A final look can catch an error while there is still time to fix it.

Choose the checkout method that suits your needs. An account can make later orders quicker, while guest checkout offers a direct way to send flowers once without creating a login.

More on this: flowers in Viennese art