

To buy flowers directly from local growers, find farms that sell to the public and check how they take orders. You may be able to buy at a farmers market, collect an order at the farm, or arrange a seasonal subscription.

Find growers near you

Start at a farmers market and look for a stall selling flowers grown by the person behind the table. Ask where the flowers were grown. A seller may grow every stem, buy some from other farms, or offer a mix.

Local farm directories, community agriculture groups, and market listings can also help you find growers. Search for flower farms in your area, then check their current information before making a trip. Some farms open to visitors only on certain days or sell by appointment.

Keep an eye out for roadside signs during the growing season. If you see a small stand beside a field, read the posted instructions: it might be self service, or it might list a number to call.

Ask before you order

Growers sell flowers in different ways. One might offer ready made bunches at a Saturday market, while another takes advance orders for buckets of loose stems. Ask what is available, how to order, and where you will collect the flowers.

If you need flowers for a particular day, share the date and your preferred colors early. A grower can tell you what is likely to be in season, though exact varieties may depend on the weather and harvest. Ask about substitutions if a specific flower matters to you.

For a larger order, ask how many stems or buckets you might need, when payment is due, and how the flowers should be stored before use. Let the grower know if you plan to arrange them yourself.

Make your purchase

1. Choose a grower whose collection point and available dates work for you.
2. Ask for the current selection and explain how you plan to use the flowers.
3. Confirm the quantity, total cost, payment method, and collection time before ordering.
4. Bring a clean bucket with a little water if you are collecting loose stems, and ask the grower how best to transport them.
5. Once home, place the flowers in clean water and follow any care instructions provided.

For a simple table arrangement, a small mixed bunch may be enough. If you want several vases for a gathering, describe their size and number so the grower can help you judge the quantity.

Questions about buying from growers

Can I visit a flower farm without an appointment?

Some farms welcome visitors during set hours, but others do not have a public sales area. Check before you go.

Can I choose the exact flowers in my bunch?

Sometimes. Ask what is ready to harvest and whether individual stems can be selected. Ready made bunches may not be customizable.

Are local flowers available all year?

Availability depends on the climate and the grower. Ask about the local season and what, if anything, is offered outside it.
