Employment Attorney Omaha Guidance for Nebraska Employers Employment rules in Nebraska rarely sit still. In 2026 alone, the state enacted LB 921 on April 14, expanding the notice requirements employers must follow before certain workforce reductions under the state's WARN Act. A few months earlier, LB 258 was signed on February 9, 2026, bringing changes to Nebraska's minimum wage. For HR managers and business owners in Omaha, those two laws show why having an employment attorney on call is less a luxury than https://damienafid347.quillnesty.com/posts/do-you-need-an-estate-planning-attorney-in-nebraska a practical safeguard. Erickson | Sederstrom P.C., L.L.O. focuses its employment practice mainly on advising and defending employers. The work covers wage and hour compliance, OSHA compliance, employee handbooks and manuals, labor-management relations, FMLA, ADA, and ADEA issues, workers' compensation, and executive employment agreements. It also includes protecting the business itself through trade secret safeguards and carefully drafted non-compete agreements. The firm publishes updates comparing non-compete rules across Nebraska, Iowa, Kansas, Missouri, Colorado, and South Dakota, which is helpful for Omaha employers whose workers live in Council Bluffs or travel across state lines for the job. When problems turn into claims, the same team defends employers against discrimination charges, wrongful discharge allegations, and employment litigation. Early advice often makes a real difference. A handbook policy written with care, a termination documented properly, or a leave request handled correctly under the FMLA can help keep a dispute from ever reaching court. That preventive mindset is why many employers treat their Omaha law firm as a standing resource instead of a last call when something goes wrong.
