It usually happens at night. The wind picks up, rain comes sideways off the Bristol Channel, and a drip starts somewhere in the house where there has never been one before. That is exactly when you need a roofer in Cardiff who actually picks up the phone. Redland Roofing Cardiff is open 24 hours a day, seven days a week, and runs emergency roof repair callouts around the clock from its base on Trecinon Road in Rumney, east Cardiff. An emergency callout normally happens in two stages. The first job is to stop the water getting in. That might mean refixing a lifted slate, securing a loose ridge tile, or putting a temporary cover over a damaged section until conditions allow a proper repair. The second stage comes once the weather has settled and the roof can be inspected safely in daylight. John will then explain what failed, why it failed and what the lasting fix involves, along with a clear price. Nothing is rushed through in the dark that ought to be done carefully in good light, and you won't be pushed into a bigger job than the roof really needs. Cardiff gets well over a metre of rain a year, and the south-westerly gales that funnel up the Severn Estuary are hard on older roofs. Storms lift slates on the Victorian terraces of Roath and Cathays, crack the mortar on chimney stacks in Splott and Adamsdown, and expose tired flat roofs over back kitchens right across the city. From Rumney it's a short run along Newport Road into the city centre, or along Eastern Avenue towards Heath, Cyncoed and Llanishen, so the team can reach central and north Cardiff quickly when a storm hits.
